Vegetable Gardening

While the unusually warm weather makes it seem like spring is around the corner we know the calendar says differently. It may not be practical to start spading the garden but there are things we can do. Seed catalogs have been coming for over a month already and some of us are having a problem not ordering every new variety with a beautiful picture and a great story line. Before ordering all those enticing new varieties plus a few old favorites we do need to think about space and also labor for planting, weed control, harvesting, and what we will do with that bountiful harvest. I have plenty of space but I still have a tendency to over purchase seed and then over plant a larger area than I can take care of once haying season hits. Even knowing that I probably have most of the seed I need it is still fun to peruse the seed catalog and look at the new varieties which promise to out produce all other varieties.
